The microspectro-microtomography technique is useful for visualizing molecular structures in thin tissue sections or brain slices. The diffraction-limited microscopic field of view and the high numerical aperture optics available in a multiphoton microscope make this a very flexible and appealing approach. However, excitation within the focal region also produces multiple fluorescence photons that can be mistaken as unwanted scattering or bleaching events. Many of the multiphoton excitation schemes are not wave-length-selective and will excite all fluorophores with suitable absorption spectral characteristics. Other factors that may affect the fluorescence microspectroscopy quality include differences between sample and laser beam propagation. It is shown here that the current multiphoton microscope has a limited penetration and can only fully resolve structures located more than 4 mm below the surface. Theoretical and computational tools are introduced that allow the estimation of the penetration depth and of the fluorescent and scattering signals created in the sample during the microscope illumination. This then allows us to estimate the spatial resolution and the safety of different excitation schemes. This knowledge is very useful for the selection of laser system parameters and to design novel applications for the multiphoton microscope.![](brjcancer00073-0111.tif "sc
