I know that the standard Lucene index is on the text (words in a text document). But there are another kinds of indexes, such as the inverted index, which is used in inverted list and auto-completion. Are these indexes different from the text index? Are there any documentations about it? Thanks A: The overall index is built by concatenating all the text documents into a single file, then using a merge filter to re-parse the text documents and update the inverted index. Then the created inverted index is queried to perform on-the-fly autocomplete suggestions. Q: C printf : bad argument `int' to `%b' - while using b from integer While I try to printf a int using %b format specifier, I get the following error message: line 32: bad argument '%b' to 'int' Here is the code: int n = 0; char buffer[10]; printf("test%b", n); I saw that the %b can be used to print char* in a number of ways. However, I don't understand why this error message pops up (because I used a number in this example). I also tried another solution: int n = 0; char buffer[10]; printf("test%d", n); This method also works, and I don't get any error message. The problem is not related to printf's output, because if I replace printf by echo, I still get the same error message: echo "test%b" test 0 How is it possible to print an integer using %b with the b modifier? A: printf("test%b", n); The argument to %b is a wide char; if you try to printf an int you 6d1f23a050
